

JOURNAL OF HOSPITAL ETHICS

The care of hospital patients is often complicated by the need for unexpected, life-altering decisionmaking. Clinicians are often faced with conflicting values from other members of their team, patients, and families, frequently compounded by the absence of clear-cut advance directives. Under such conditions of moral uncertainty, clinical ethicists make an important contribution, helping shape appropriate and practical approaches to ethical complications in patient care. The Center for Ethics is involved in approximately 300 clinical ethics consultations a year, coupled with the development and implementation of nationally recognized bioethics education programming.

The Journal of Hospital Ethics (JOHE) is a specialized periodical serving as an extension of this work, directed at physicians, other clinicians, hospital administrators, and all manner of health care professionals. JOHE also serves as an educational resource for medical and surgical residency programs, ethics committees, and graduate schools across the country and abroad.

JOHE takes a common sense approach to bioethics education by including real cases encountered in hospital-based patient care, thoughtful and scholarly articles written by experienced health care professionals, and practical guidance to assist in resolving ethical uncertainties and conflict.
